DOJ,

As a software developer interested in the real progress of technology I'm disappointed in recent developments concerning Microsoft and so-called 'Department of Justice', since the Bush regime came to power. Computing is such an important issue for the whole of society that it should be encouraged to progress, or at least allowed to progress freely. It should be realized that talking about innovation in sound bites is not the same as being actually technically innovative! For the Department of Justice to live up to it's name (i.e., Justice) and at least be worthy of some respect, perhaps companies convicted of monopolies should be held accountable for their behavior.

Allowing Microsoft to place many Intell computers, running Microsoft OSs, in the schools as some sort of punishment is so unfortunate. Is the Bush DOJ part of Microsofts Marketing department?
